

Overview

Flow cytometry is a laser-based technology typically used to measure fluorescence intensity or scattered light, to obtain valuable information of the cells by analyzing their physical properties.

Flow cytometry has become readily available in research and clinical settings, and its applications have advanced rapidly in parallel with significant improvements in instrumentation and the availability of a wide array of monoclonal reagents. Properly performed, flow cytometry can provide rapid and accurate characterization of your cells of interest.